Medical Decisions and Cremation

Our adult catechesis for November focused on end-of-life issues and funeral planning. I'd like to highlight a few things from it, of which too many Catholics are unaware.

The first concerns the Church's teaching on informed conscience and the need for the virtue of prudence, which applies moral principles to particular circumstances. In the field of medicine, advances and new technologies can become available very quickly. It is impossible to foresee all possibilities and particular circumstances of every scenario. Because of this, the Catholic Church prefers that when it comes to medical decisions that need to be made on behalf of someone who can no longer advocate for themselves, these should be made by a person or persons previously designated by the patient. For minors, the parents or legal guardian(s) have this responsibility. For adults, this is usually done by designating a durable power of attorney, often the patient's adult children or a trusted friend who has some knowledge of the person's wishes and the Church's teaching on the sacredness of human life.

A living person can exercise prudence and take into account the particulars of a situation and availability of new treatments in a way that a static list cannot, often called a living will, filled out in advance, listing which treatments the patient is willing to receive and which treatments he is not. The staff of healthcare facilities may be more used to just asking for a living will, but giving them documentation on durable power of attorney instead is more in line with Catholic principles.

The other thing more and more Catholics seem not to realize is that although in recent decades the Church has permitted the cremation of a person's bodily remains, the Church's clear preference is still that the actual body be present for the funeral rites and that cremation take place after the funeral and before burial, or indeed, that cremation not take place at all and that the body would be buried as well.

If cremation does take place, the cremated remains are to be treated with the same respect given to the human body, including the use of a worthy vessel to contain them, and that all of them be put to rest in sacred ground. It is never permissible to keep any portion or scatter them outside. Paragraphs 411 to 417 of the Order of Christian Funerals states these teachings more forcefully than anything I heard or observed about it while growing up or even while I was in seminary.
